

Depending on the type of input configurations, two different optimized structures resulted by the same Computational Method. These two were different in their energy values and the two sets of NMR chemical shifts corresponding to the structure also displayed in the image above.

The question would be to what extent can the experimental results distinguish the existence of such structures only marginally different in stability but with distinctly different configuration and NMR features?